The main interest of Self-Representation and Illusion lies in the careful and engaging discussion of important, well-known aspects of Seneca's plays on which L. is able to shed new light. The book does not attempt (intentionally) an overall description of Seneca's tragic universe, but its intimation of a 'a broken world' with no fixed doctrinal or literary points, conveyed by the polycentric structure of the monograph itself, is both engaging and persuasive.

In our enriched model of the Enfacement illusion, we suggested not only which brain areas are involved, but also different perceptual and cognitive processes that dynamically contribute to establish (e.g., visual-remapping of touch, remapping of peri-personal space, updating of self-face representation that lead to conflict suppression) and then maintain (e.g., attenuation of sensory, visual and interoceptive processing that lead to a newly formed coherent sense of bodily self)

Enfacement.

This experience seems incredibly real but a wealth of recent scientific evidence reveals that this notion of the independent, coherent self is an illusion - it is not what it seems. Reality as we perceive it is not something that objectively exists, but something that our brains construct from moment to moment, interpreting, summarizing, and substituting information along the way.

However, recent evidence shows that self-other distinction can be easily blurred by synchronous interpersonal visuotactile stimulation of one's own and another person's face, an effect we named enfacement illusion (Sforza et al. 2010). Participants incorporate facial features of the other into the self-face representation and, at a phenomenological level, report to be feeling the tactile stimulus observed on another person's face and to be looking at themselves in the mirror.
